President Abene Issues His State Of The College Address

by Keyla Jones

What is the state of Marian College today? A crowd of one hundred faculty, staff and students gathered in the auditorium of the Library during the lunch hour on October 12, to get the answers from Dr. Robert Abene in his State of the College address.

In his initial observation of the college, Abene noted that Marian offers a few strong academic programs, as well as a solid reputation in the Indianapolis area for community service, but despite these noble claims, Marian has a series of shortcomings that include image, conservatism, and no clear indication of Catholic heritage. But most the notable of Marian's shortcomings was its $1.3 million deficit.

Marian has a hard time attracting and retaining students. Official numbers indicate that the number of full-time returning students is decreasing.

With enrollment figures down, the college was unable to meet its projected 1999-2000 budget. And because of this, the administration is looking at a 3% reduction in the college's operational budget. For the second year in a row, faculty and staff will not receive raises. To offset the loss, the president proposed that the college institute a hiring freeze, and refrain from investing in additional faculty development programs. By doing this, Marian should be able to counterbalance its loss.

Though the picture looks grim and dismal, Abene remarked that he sees this as an opportunity. His objective is to create growth for Marian College by regaining financial strength and increasing enrollment numbers. To do this, Abene issued a call to action for the Marian community. This involves the development of a comprehensive strategic plan and taking a look at academic offerings to adult students. Part of Abene's proposal involves the development of an evening and weekend opportunity. His objective is to create growth for Marian to pull them and their money in.

The charge to the faculty and staff of Marian is to consider this time of financial hardship as an opportunity to move towards progress. It is Abene's hope that each person will participate in the process of creating a better Marian.

Students Get Jiggy With Jesus During Annual Shalom Retreat

Due to broken down scanners in the Mac lab and lack of access to Fisher Hall scanners during its posted open hours, there will be no pictures in this edition.

by Wendy Nine

On October 22 approximately sixty students from paid twenty dollars to venture to Oldenburg to find peace with God, themselves, neighbor, creation and today.

The retreat lasts from Friday evening until Sunday lunch during which students are broken into smaller groups to listen to people giving speeches, and allows the participants to speak more openly. They also take walks, talked with other students and took personal time for reflection and solitude.

Christian Mehall who went for the second time, was one of the students that gave a speech over peace with God. He said that people go on a strictly volunteer basis. People usually go because they had a good time last time or have heard positive things about the retreat. "There was an even representative from each class, it's an opportunity to get to know one another," said Mehall.

The retreat isn't just for students who are Catholic, it's open to everyone. You don't have to be really religious to get something out of it either. "It's up to the individual to walk away with a new sense of spirituality, a renewed sense of who you are and where you are at in your life, you usually walk away with a lot." Said Mehall.

Living Out The Franciscan Values
by Della Pacheco
Director of Communications

To the Editor
After reading Wendy Nine's "Earning Life Experience" article (and wiping a few tears from my eyes), I had to write to say how proud I am of her and the many Marian students who are living our Franciscan values.

Wendy speaks for many of us who understand that while some choose careers for prestige or money, many others understand that the call to help others can be as equally strong and rewarding.

I am not a graduate of Marian (that large urban university downtown is my alma mater), but I feel blessed every day to work at this very special college.

Virgin’s Art Exhibit Is a Success
by Jessica Corbin

Stepping into the gallery is like stepping into a book of short stories written by artist Josie Virgin. In one story, the viewer is able to take a trip to the rural south. Each picture is a stop allowing the viewer to enjoy the local, country color and get some insight into who they are and what makes up their lives. For example, in “Where Oswengo and Ontario Meet” the artist captures a meal at what seems to be a local picnic with the older folk sitting around telling stories of years past. In another story, the viewer get at a mother doing her nightly routine.

I found Miss Virgin's work to be very entertaining. The pictures of humans in their surroundings are done in a similar mentality as Dorothea Lange’s photos. Lange's works evoke an emotion which drives people to action; while Virgin’s work evokes emotions which persuade people to reminisce about simpler times and to question progression and what it means to be human. Both though capture people’s daily lives. In the works, using her mother as the model, the artist question what it means to be a woman, a mother, and connects it to the question of “What does it mean to be human.” The pieces are all well composed using repeated lines, shapes, and values to tell her stories. Virgin used the works of Imogene Cunningham as models for lighting her photos. While Virgin’s series application came from the artist Robert Frank who took a series of pictures as an outsider looking in.

The artist is not yet set in her ways though. On one wall, she shows her experimentation with formalism, manipulating some ambiguous, and some recognizable shapes of different values to form compositions. These works are totally different from her other pieces and add a little unsuspected spice to the show. The compositions work great, but it would have been nice if she was able to designate a difference between these photos and the rest of her work through either a change in framing technique or with a written description of where this experiment is going or even if it was an experiment.

The exhibition was laid out with extreme care, and it showed. The use of the unfinished wood frames worked great with all the pictures except for the formalist pieces. They help convey a sense of simplicity and create a finished uniformed feeling for the show. On the night of the opening, the only non photographic piece was a human form sculpture, which was easily missed because it was stuck out in the hall with other artists, that were away from Virgin's work.

Miss Virgin’s exhibition is a visual success, and opened to probably the largest crowd that the Marian college gallery has ever seen. Students should take the opportunity to stop and take time to see the stories.

Imagine meeting someone famous while grocery shopping or seeing your favorite TV star in line at McDonald's. Would you be brave and daring and go up and talk to them or would you sit idly by and let the opportunity pass you by? I chose to be brave and daring.

On fall break, I travelled to Stratford Canada for the Shakespeare Festival. This was my third year going, and by far the most exciting. Michael Terault is an actor. He is the one I look for every time I go to Canada. My infatuation with him is somewhat out of control and I talk about how wonderful he is the whole time we are there. I thought my friend was playing a joke on me at a bar one night. We were sitting there and he said to me, "Hey Denise, what would you do if Michael were here?" "Go talk to him." He wasn't joking. I look up and we are in the midst of about 50 actors, just seen on stage and can only control and I talk about how wonderful he is the whole time we are there. I look up and we are in the midst of about 50 actors, just seen on stage and can only talk about acting, sports, Thanksgiving, all kinds of stuff. They were all just as impressed with me as I was with them. It was a feeling out of this world to be told by professional actors that you can be doing the same thing they are doing. That is my dream. Two hours had passes before I realized how late it was getting and how long I had actually been standing there. I was on cloud nine. My smile stretched form ear to ear and my eyes were shining. I absolutely could not believe my luck.

Not only had I just made friends with some of the most awesome people in the world, Graham offered to take me on a tour of the theatre the next morning. I got to stand on the stage! I saw some of them on the street the next day and they remembered me and said hi. Graham told me to come backstage if I came back next year and say hi. I have already written him a letter. He said he would write me back; we'll see. This was by far the best fall break of my life!

The date: October 1, 1999.
The time: approximately 9:30.
The location: Kessler Blvd. The innocent victim: a Marion Se­nior. The events you are about to read are real. No actors were involved, nothing is fiction. Due to the serious nature of the story names have been changed to protect the innocent. The fol­lowing is a statement from "Pangela Tatem."

It all happened when a an evil man in a Cadillac tank made the mistake of slamming into my car while travelling at ludicrous speed.

I was en route to the gro­cery store to pick up my friend. I was no more than 30 feet from the entrance to my apartment complex. While I can't go into the exact details due to impending litigation, I can say that when I wreak something I don't just do it half way.

I was hit. I did four of five 360's and clipped a car amidst one of my many spins. Once I landed, I decided that getting out of the car might be key. I hadn't realized the car was demolished, but my windshield was cracked, and that the little hula girl on my dash board was wiggling so awkwardly that I thought she might need a hip replacement.

I got out of the car and screamed. Not a, "Oh my God a brown recluse!" scream, but a "Halloween 26" scream..

The car that smacked me had spun on to the ramp lead­ing to 38th street. I hobbled to his car to make sure everyone was okay. He didn't care how I was doing; I think once he saw I lived, he wanted to try and fin­ish the job. He came at me, so I limped away as fast as I could trying to avoid his hugging.

I was frightened. Half my car was lying in the middle of Kessler, my knees were bleeding, this guy wanted to snap my neck in two. I tried to convince wit­nesses at the scene that I lived no more than 50 feet away and that letting me go to my apart­ment would be best for every­one. One kind soul let me call my roommate Sugar Cane on her cell phone. Then came the ambulances, the fire truck, the police cars, the lawyers.

I kept asking everyone if I my face had been ruined. I knew my career as model for Nair was over.

Sugar called my brother Jerry CurlTatem who was so dis­mayed that he pounded a beer immediately. Meanwhile some paramedic put a neck brace on me. I felt like one of those dogs that have that satellite dish thing around their necks so that they can't like themselves. The para­medic kept telling me that I needed to stay still. I was placed on a board and taped down like the gerbil in the joke.

At the hospital, I was told I was going to live. Dammit. I got home about 4:30, about the time I usually get home. My brother never made it to the hospital, due to the grief and distress my accident caused him, he went to a party.

The car is destroyed, I am more mentally scarred, but some good has come from all this ug­liness. This meeting of metal was not my fault and the kindly insurance sprites are going to cover the costs. To think that no more than three weeks ago I was close to food stamps, and now I'm going to be so nastily rich that I can install a hot tub in the Carbon office and stock it with Chip and Dales.
